P R E F A C E .

About one mile north of the Court House at Schoharie, New York, stands a substantial stone building erected and used as a church before the Revolution.

In October 1780, Sir. John Johnson, the Indian Chief Brant, with a large force of soldiers, Tories and Indians visited the Schoharie Valley, murdered one hundred of the inhabitants, destroyed their houses and barns and 100,000 bushels of grain.

The invaders attacked the Fort which had been constructed about the church, but it was defended with such vigor they withdrew. A cannon ball fired by the enemy pierced the roof of the church and lodged in a rafter.

The ground about this church, now known as the Old Stone Fort; long used as a burial place, is a modern cemetery well laid out and cared for. The building is now the home of the Schoharie County Historical Society who have an interesting collection of ancient relics in the museum on the second floor.

The view from the tower is one of unusual beauty; the distant hills, the rocks, the river winding through the field and meadows are suggestive of the peace and tranquility which now prevail in this charming valley. Close at hand the well travelled road crosses Fox's Creek whose waters ripple over its stoney bed as in the days of yore when the Indian had his wigwam by the river into which this stream flows.

Beneath our feet lie buried many former residents of the county-seat, among them a number of the writer's friends and acquaintances, friends of other days when he was a yearly visitor to this beautiful valley, drawn thither by its wealth of geological treasures. Reverently we walk among the graves reading here and there a well known name inscribed upon the stones, and pause beside the last resting place of one who loved this valley, whose life and whose name is a precious and cherished memory, and in remembrance of whom these inscriptions have been transcribed and are herein preserved.

FRANK D. ANDREWS.
